Potential Competing Financial Interests of the Annals of Emergency Medicine Editors

Annals of Emergency Medicine is committed to the greatest possible transparency and avoidance of any potential conflict of interest. The journal already has rigorous practices for identifying potential conflicts of interest among authors and peer reviewers, and this list now expands the practice for all members of the editorial board who make decisions about the acceptance and publication of manuscripts. This list is updated annually and is meant to identify all sources of financial benefit related in any way to the health care industry or any topic discussed in articles managed. More detail can be provided if available.

Editor in Chief
Michael L. Callaham, MD
Employer: University of California San Francisco
Other income: Editor stipend from American College of Emergency Physicians, as well as reimbursement for travel and lodging expenses to ACEP or Annals-related business meetings. I own shares of health-related mutual funds, and also index funds representative of the broad stock market, which may include health care companies. I do not control any decisions about what companies are included in these funds. I receive no payments from nor have any financial interest in any for-profit pharmaceutical or medical device company. I am occasionally paid an honorarium for speaking at educational conferences.

Deputy Editors
Richard C. Dart, MD, PhD
Employer: Rocky Mountain Poison and Drug Center, Denver Health and Hospital Authority
